Orienteering

Locate

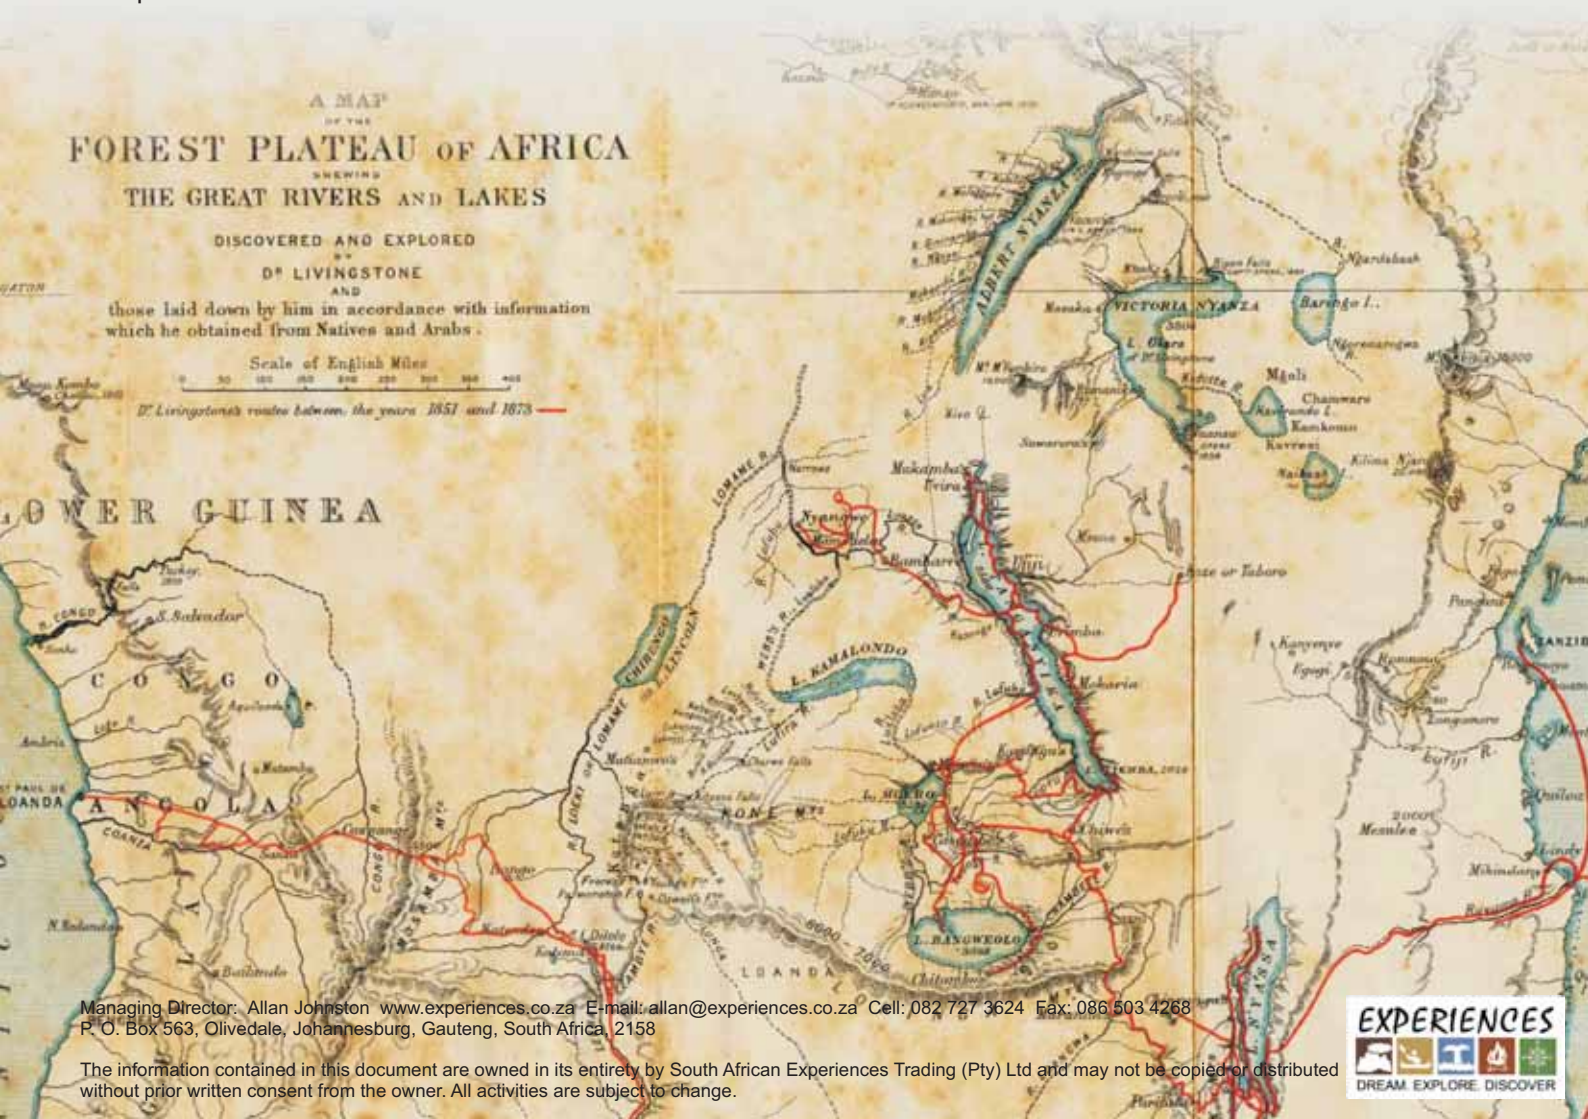

find our way

Orienteering is a competitive event where participants use their 'quick-thinking' navigational skills, a map and a compass to move from point to point in the least amount of time.

Orienteers use highly detailed maps to find markers called controls that have been placed in the landscape. In most orienteering events, the participant must locate the controls in a specified order.

The routes between the controls are not specified. In order to complete an orienteering course, the orienteer must choose routes between controls, navigate that route, and do so as quickly as possible.

This experience is excellent for team building, communication and leadership development.
